

Trefor Lloyd has a long experience of carrying out research and investigations (usually leading to projects). He has over the years researched, developed and delivered a range of programmes targeting boys and young men, primarily in schools, but also youth services, criminal justice and community settings.

He has written a number of books, reports, research findings, articles and other materials about health, fatherhood, adolescence, masculinity and development.

While his background is in child development, he could be described professionally as 1 part researcher and evaluator; 4 parts programme developer and deliverer; 2 parts writer and trainer, and 1 part library and statistics geek.

His current work includes developing and delivering interventions targeting boys (and their families) who are struggling to settle in reception and year 1 (Stand Out Children Project), and supporting primary schools in their management of children's behaviour (particularly boys). All of his work is currently in the London Borough of Southwark.
